The researcher's goal is to establish the level of inclusive education in more quantifiable terms. The empirical study technique used to investigate the status of inclusive education is discussed in this chapter. The research design and technique are discussed in this chapter. "Research design covers the processes on how to do research, including when, from whom, and under what conditions the data will be gathered," according to McMillan and Schumacher (2001). It also explains how the research is set up, including the data collection methods and the overall strategy for executing the study.

The study design used for the empirical investigation was addressed in this chapter. The observation schedule, checklist, questionnaire, interview guide, focus group discussion, and papers as research instruments were all thoroughly defined, as well as the technique for administering them. Regardless of how genuine, reliable, or appropriate the data is, it will not be useful until it is meticulously edited and systematically evaluated, intelligently analyzed, and rationally concluded. Statistics is the method that is employed for this. After data gathering, the statistical treatment is the next critical step.

The core of each research effort is data analysis and interpretation of findings. The analysis of data in an investigation comprises scrutinizing data in order to identify the underlying facts. This chapter tries to explain the steps and procedures that the researcher uses to analyze and evaluate the data. To analyze and interpret the new developing facts, the material is examined from as many viewpoints as feasible. In addition to the tabular presentation of the data, a fitting explanation is provided.
